Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER IV. I Went on contemplating and rhyming, while Geofroi continued his strain, the mechanical cadence of which convinced me he was musing too, till I was roused by the dull and hollow sound of a horn, blown, as it seemed to me, on the opposite bank of the river, and echoing or answered in the wood beside me. The insinuations of the inspector rushed upon my mind, and I thought there were few more convenient places for rifling a poor travellers knapsack, and levying contributions on his purse. But the reader will remark my forbearance, in saying nothing of the determined air with which I cocked my gun, nor the desperate resolution I formed, not to be robbed by less than six highwaymen at any rate. I called out to Geoffroi (in whatever tone my readers may severally fancy) to know what was meant by these sounds. Ah! sir, are you awake Well, you have made a good sleep of it. Egad, I believe you had a lesson from the worthy slug-a-bed Batiste; but you are far from coming up to your master yet. I confess I did not like this evasion, and I repeated my question somewhat sharply. Why, lord! sir, are you afraid of robbers Having got so far, you may make yourself easy on that head; for certainly the most convenient time to have cut yours or any other gentlemans throat was while you were asleep in a dark wood...
