Excerpt from Philadelphia Medical Times, Vol. 8: A Bi-Weekly Journal of Medical and Surgical Science; March 2, 1878 In removing the lens I pressed with one hand by the Daviel spoon the sclerotic edge of the wound slightly and gently downwards, while with the caoutchouc spoon in the other hand by light pressure and sliding movements over the cornea I endeavored to remove the lens as carefully and thoroughly as possible. After the removal of the lens the pupillary region was examined by oblique illumination. In many cases of cataract I dilated the pupil by atropia previous to the operation, in other cases I omitted it. Neither the application nor the omission of the atropia seemed to exert any influence on the result of the operation.
